

Nickname: Mario at the Cinderella Castle, "Let's a go!"

Logo: We see a starry sky, then the camera pans down to see a river's bank a-la the 2006 Walt Disney Pictures logo. After that, we see the castle's flagpole, except that Mario is hanging on to the flagpole at its top. After that he lowers the Cinderella Castle's flag, for which we then hear the Flagpole sound from Super Mario Bros as Mario lowers the flag. Fireworks then go off like in the normal Walt Disney Pictures logo, except that they make the Super Mario Bros. Fireworks noises instead of regular fireworks noises. We also see Mario running down the right side of the screen, where he begins to do a triple jump. When he does the second jump, he jumps off the right side of the screen but lands on the left side. After landing, he does his third jump over the Cinderella Castle, leaving a trail of sparkling dust in the form of an arc just like the regular logo. We then see "Walt Disney Pictures" in its corporate font fade in beneath the castle just like the regular logo. Then Mario says "Let's a go!" when the logo fades to black.

Television Variant: The television variant just features Mario jumping over the castle and he says "Let's a go!" while jumping over the castle.

SFX: High quality animation like the the new Walt Disney Pictures logo, Mario lowering the flag, the fireworks going off, the sparkling arc Mario makes as he jumps over the castle. Logo also has a Super Mario Bros. stage as the surrounding background instead of castle walls.

Music: Same as the new Walt Disney Pictures logo. None on the television variant, though.

Availability: On all movies done between Nintendo, Disney and Disney-Pixar Animation Studios.

Scare Factor: May surprise some who seen this for the first time, especially those who aren't quite used to the 2006 Walt Disney Pictures logo yet, but it's otherwise a great logo.